TO RELIEVE COUNTY OF PRISON CASES COSTS

Bill Introduced at Harrisburg to Remedy New Situation.

RESULT OF HOGAN CASE

New Law Places Costs of Prosecutions of Prisoners Escaping From Penitentiary on Counties Where Originally Sentenced.

Following out the suggestion advanced last week by "The Republican" legislation has been introduced at Harrisburg to prevent Centre County being saddled with the costs resulting from prosecuting and maintaining prisoners who escape from the new penitentiary nearby Bellefonte. The need for such corrective legislation was made manifest by the trial and acquittal of William Hogan, the first prisoner to skip out from the prison farm. Had he been convicted and sentenced to an additional term the cost of maintaining him for such term would have been placed upon Centre County. Hogan's case also made it clear that under the circumstances convictions in the future would be difficult if not impossible.

In the Senate at Harrisburg on Monday night Senator David T. Hunter, of Pittsburgh, who has visited Bellefonte on a number of occasions, introduced a bill charging the costs of prosecution in cases of convicts who eseape from the new penitentiary in Centre County to the county from which the convicts in question were originally sentenced. This legislation relieves Centre County of what would have become an excessive and unfair burden to the taxpayers.

Under the bill introduced by Senator Hunter if a convict is sentenced to the new penitentiary from Blair County and he breaks prison and is recaptured, the costs of prosecution and maintenance while he is serving out his additional term will fall upon Blair County. The court proceedings resulting from such cases will take place in Centre County but the costs resulting therefrom will be charged back to the county from which the prisoner is originally sentenced.

Warden John Francies was personally represented at the trial of Hogan by John M. Egan, chief parole officer of the penitentiary. Immediately following the acquittal of Hogan Mr. Egan reported to Warden Francies and acquainted him with the fact that a strong sentiment prevailed here against unnecessarily burdening Centre County with the costs of such cases. Warden Francies thereupon had a bill drafted to cover the matter and had it introduced at Harrisburg by Senator Hunter. The early passage of the bill is anticipated.

Two Circus Men Injured.

Two employees of the Young Buffalo circus met with injuries while the show was in Bellefonte. The circus was billed for Renovo on Friday but after arriving at that place it was decided not to unload owing to an-all day rain. The special train of about 20 cars was started for Bellefonte on Friday afternoon but was held back five or six hours nearby Lock Haven by a broken truck on one of the cars. It was about 9 o'clock when the train reached Bellefonte. The sleeping cars were run into a siding below the freight station and the cars for animals, canvas, etc., were shifted into a siding near the passenger station. One of the circus employees was injured while shifting cars near the Crider lumber yard. He was removed to the Bellefonte hospital, where his injuries were dressed, and he was able to return to work on the following day. On leaving the hospital he remarked that he had slept the night before in the best bed he had been privileged to occupy for seventeen years. During the afternoon performance one of the rough-riders was thrown from a broncho and landed on a tent stake. He was rendered almost unconscious and had to be carried out of the ring. The afternoon crowd was one of the largest the circus has enjoyed this season. The show was especially good for its kind. Lack of the usual clown features made it somewhat disappointing to the children. The riding and shooting was of a high standard. The show officials were courteous and obliging and exerted themselves to maintain the best of order and accommodate visitors. From Bellefonte the circus went to Lock Haven, where two exhibitions were given on Monday.

New Electric Cars.

Within the next few weeks Pullman electric cars will be installed on the trolley line between Tyrone and Altoona.

LONG LIST OF CASES SECOND WEEK OF COURT

Juries Hand Down Verdicts in Number of Civil Suits.

MAY SENTENCE TODAY

Court About Ready to Pronounce Punishment on Number of Persons Pleading Guilty or Convicted of Criminal Offences.

When "The Republican" went to press last week the trial of John Taylor was under way in court. Taylor was charged with aiding in the escape of Harry Mease from jail several weeks ago, having been implicated when Mease was recaptured. When Taylor's cell was searched there was found two small hammers, a pair of pliers, two files, two knives, and a broken fork made into a screw driver, and some of the Commonwealth witnesses alleged that the defendant urged Mease to escape, had given him a board with which to prop up the cellar door and offered to put the hose out of the jail window with which to get over the jail wall. The defendant denied the giving of the board or assisting Mease to escape. Under the testimony of Mease it developed that he got into cell No. 1, which was not locked, took up some boards, dug a hole through the wall into the cellar of the residence part of the jail which he had done sometime previous to the night he escaped, and that it was by this way that he escaped by lifting the cellar door in the hall between the jail and the residence part and passing from there into the jail yard where he procured a board and placed it upon the porch roof and thus gained the top of the jail wall. Other prisoners testified that Taylor had been saying to Mease that he was a coward and had lost his nerve. All of this the defendant denied, excepting that he might have said in a bantering way that he had lost his nerve, that all of the prisoners in the jail knew of Mease's proposed escaping. Verdict on Thursday afternoon of guilty.

Other criminal cases for the week were disposed of as follows:

Defendant appeared in open court and plead guilty, whereupon the district attorney stated that he thought it was a proper case to suspend sentence upon payment of costs, which was done and the defendant to enter into recognizance.

"Each Year Our Memories Are Quickened."

In the Memorial Day plans for strewing flowers upon the graves of war veterans the grave of the great War Governor, Andrew Gregg Curtin, has been by no means forgotten by survivors of his old command. The Philadelphia Association of the Pennsylvania Reserves, in keeping with a custom inaugurated eighteen years ago has sent a beautiful floral design to be placed on Governor Curtin's grave in the Union cemetery. The design has been taken in charge by the Gregg Post, No. 95, G. A. R.

As noted in our columns a year or two ago the idea of having the Pennsylvania Reserves send a floral design for Curtin's grave each Memorial Day originated with one of the War Governor's "boys," Owen Jones, of the Twentieth Ward, Philadelphia. That was eighteen years ago, and each year since Mr. Jones has personally attended to the matter. Some times the amount subscribed by others has not quite come up to the figure desired but Mr. Jones never has allowed that to interfere with a custom that to him has become a sacred duty. Although of moderate means he never has been too poor to personally make up any deficit that attended the purchase of the design from year to year. The writer recalls a comment made by Mr. Jones some years ago when it was announced that Colonel Alexander K. McClure, a great friend of Curtin, had passed away.

"McClure was a fine man," said Mr. Jones. "He never forgot. He was always one of my best contributors to the floral design for the Governor's grave."

What prettier sentiment could one find than that contained in a brief note received from Mr. Jones by the editor of "The Republican" a day or two ago. Commenting on the sending of the floral design this year, he added:

"This is the eighteenth year this design has been sent to your city, and each year our memories are quickened, as they will be as long as we live."

Surely, friendship and loyalty of a superior type are revealed in the zealous and affectionate care with which one of Curtin's "boys" keeps green the grave of his old commander. Understanding this loyalty and patriotism of a man who deemed it a privilege to serve under Curtin, one is better able to appreciate the following which was published in the Philadelphia "Ledger" a short time ago:

Sir—United as brothers, the soldiers of the South join the soldiers of the North in meeting, not as Johnnies nor Yankees, but as Americans, now and forever, on the first, second, third and fourth days of July, 1913, on the field renowned the world over for deeds of valor, equally shown by those who wore the gray as well as by those who wore the blue. And on that battlefield we, as soldiers of the Civil War, will pledge ourselves, now and henceforth, united under one flag, to make this country the greatest country in all the world.

This is a Government of the people, for the people and by the people, and its flag is respected and honored in every clime. The battle we here commemorate was the greatest since the beginning of time; the valorous deeds, the acts of bravery, the splendid generalship of the soldiers of the North were fully paralleled by those of the South.

Come to this reunion, you soldiers from all over the land; meet together with warm hearts and open hands, and pledge each other as Americans, under one flag, to respect and defend that flag and our country in all time to come; come in your gray uniforms and we will meet you in our blue; come with your bands playing "Dixie Land" and ours will respond with "Yankee Doodle," and we will, on that scene of strife, cement our love to country and our honor for one flag.

It will warm our hearts after 59 years of peace, we who were boys then and are now old men, to shake the hand and pat the back and then part, perhaps never to meet again on this side of eternity. Nearly all our great generals are gone. They are

"Under the sod and the dew,
Waiting the Judgment Day!
Under the roses, the Blue;
Under the lilies, the Gray."

Were they still with us, hand in hand, under one flag, they of the South and they of the North would help to make this the greatest reunion since history be ...

I would like every patriot in the Union to read this letter, and would respectfully request every paper, in every State, to copy the same.

I was a private in the rear rank with the Army of the Potomac.

CHILD FALLS INTO SPRING

Three Years-Old Paul Miller Had Narrow Escape on Sunday.

Paul, the 3-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. N. A. Miller, on South Water Street, fell into the big spring on Sunday afternoon, last, and was saved from drowning by William Rine, who is employed at the water works. Rine heard the screams of several children and ran out to the spring in time to see the little Miller boy struggling in 12 or 13 feet of water. Frank Sasserman and one or two others also heard the cries of the children and hurried to the spring.

The water is as clear as crystal and the struggling form of the Miller child could be easily seen beneath the surface of the spring. Rine jumped into the water without the slightest hesitation and in an instant had the child by the arm. He lifted him out of the water and handed him to Frank Sasserman. The child's father was on hand by that time and soon had the little fellow in his arms. Beyond being badly frightened and soaked to the skin with ice-cold water the child apparently suffered no ill effects from his thrilling experience.

$500,000 FOR PRISON

Recommended by House Appropriations Committee at Harrisburg.

The several appropriations reported out by the House Appropriations Committee at Harrisburg last week included one calling for $500,000 for the new Western Penitentiary at Bellefonte. No opposition has manifested itself against the bill and its early passage is looked for.

The $500,000 in question will be devoted to building purposes at the new prison. Construction work on the main prison building will be under way probably inside of the next seven or eight weeks. The plans for the building have been completed and approved and as soon as the Legislature paves the way by appropriating the money construction work will be begun.

The plans for the new penitentiary were submitted to Governor Tener at Harrisburg on Tuesday by the inspectors of the western penal institution and they will be formally approved. The plans, sketches of buildings and specifications were accompanied by Mr. Francies and Architect John T. Windrim. Over an hour was spent in the governor's office during which time all of the details were explained and the governor expressed his satisfaction with the general scheme and will send a formal letter of approval.

The plans call for a model institution with thirty-eight acres enclosed within a wall and accommodations for a thousand prisoners. The buildings will be in a group plan and will be constructed of native stone.

ED. HEPBURN INJURED

Edward Hepburn, the carpenter, had a narrow escape from death early Monday morning. While engaged in tacking shingles on the roof of the Walter Brown home on Lamb Street he lost his footing and dropped quite a distance to the concrete sidewalk below.

At first it was feared that he had been killed, but after a little time he was revived. It was found that he had sustained a fracture of several ribs and that he had been terribly bruised from head to foot. His injuries are not considered serious. He was removed to his home.

The House Appropriations Committee at Harrisburg has reported out a bill appropriating $16,000 for the Bellefonte hospital. Of this amount $12,000 is for maintenance and $4,000 for other purposes. The amount is by no means sufficient to meet the needs of the hospital here but it is the best that could be obtained by those having the matter in charge.

STATE-WIDE PRIMARIES FOR ALL NOMINATIONS

Time-Honored State Conventions Thing of the Past.

NEW LAW IS ASSURED

Legislation at Harrisburg Makes Provision for Direct Vote of People in Choosing all Candidates from Governor Down.

It is not improbable that the last State convention has been held in Pennsylvania and that in the future all nominations will be made at the primaries. Legislation providing for State-wide primaries is before the Legislature at Harrisburg and despatches from that place predict its early passage.

Under the present uniform primary law county conventions are already a thing of the past. The federa constitution as amended now provides for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. The State-wide primary bill now up at Harrisburg also covers the selection of United States Senators and with the nomination of Governor and other State officers, also Supreme and Superior Court Judges at primaries, there will be nothing left for the time-honored State convention.

When the last convention was held by Republicans at Harrisburg last year many persons predicted that the next State officers to be nominated would be chosen by direct vote of the people. Sentiment favoring this plan has been growing all over the State. Governor Tener strongly urged the last Republican State convention to incorporate in its platform a plank favoring State-wide primaries.

Most persons concede that the nomination of all candidates at the primaries is the logical plan to place the selection of candidates directly in the hands of the people. All candidates thus enter the field on the same footing and with an equal chance. The one weakness in the no-convention system, some persons believe, is the tendency to lessen if not entirely wipe out party sentiment. The holding of the old-fashioned county convention usually aroused considerable interest and enthusiasm in the campaign to follow. The same feature attended the holding of State conventions. Not a few persons believe that the campaigns in Centre County, for instance, have been attended with less spirit and enthusiasm under the uniform primary system than was the case under the old county convention period. At the same time the primary system renders it impossible for a few bosses or so-called leaders to get together and frame up a slate of candidates, a practice that invariably caused trouble in the past. This feature of the primary system is welcomed by all but the bosses.

If the State-wide primary bill goes through the present Legislature candidates for Superior Court Judges will be nominated under the new system this year.

Biggest Game of Season.

The biggest baseball game of the season on the home grounds will be played on Hughes field on Friday afternoon of next week, at 2.30 o'clock, between the University of Pittsburgh and the Bellefonte Academy. Symes will be in the box for the Academy. This will be by far the hardest game of the year for the Academy and the boys are going in to win if it is possible. The University of Pittsburgh has been defeating some of the best college teams this season and counts on a victory over the Academy here next week. A movement is under way to have all the business places in town close from 2.30 until 4 o'clock to enable not only the proprietors but also the clerks to witness the game. It had been planned calling the game at 3.30, but the earlier hour was decided upon to co-operate with the business men who want to see the game.

Invitation to Farmers.

The farmers of Centre County and their friends are cordially invited to make their annual visit to the School of Agriculture and Experiment Station, Friday, June 13th, 1913. The details of the various lines of experimental work which are being conducted will be explained and the practical application of these results to farm practice pointed out.

Revenge or Gratitude

A Story of the French Revolution

By F. A. MITCHEL

The tyranny of the kings of France, supported as they were by the nobles, culminated during the reign of Louis XV. Under his and previous reigns the people endured oppression. Under his successor they turned like hunted animals and swept away both the monarchy and the nobility. In the early part of the reign of Louis XVI. the latter were still disposed to treat the people as beasts created to administer to the comfort and the pleasure of the aristocratic class. In the latter part of the same reign centuries of cruelty were expatiated.

While the storm was gathering and the nobles, accustomed as they had long been to the obedience of the common people, could not think of them with fear, a hunting party sallied forth from the chateau of the Marquis de Chantaillaine and proceeded to shoot birds, not in the marquis' preserves, but in the surrounding country. It was the season for game, which was in plenty. One of the hunters, meeting a boy some sixteen or seventeen years old, accosted him:

"And why should I do that?" asked the boy.

"Why should you do that? Well, upon my word! What do you mean by asking such a question?"

"I mean that I see no more reason why I should carry your load than that you should carry mine."

The man held a whip in his hand to be used on the dogs and, regarding the youngster as no better than a dog, undertook to enforce obedience, cutting him across the face with the lash. But the spirit of rebellion against such tyranny had found a lodgment in the latter's breast, and with his fist he sent his would be master sprawling on the ground. The huntsman, rising, deliberately took aim at the boy and shot him.

Only one other of the hunting party remained behind. Seeing the boy fall, he went to him and, stanching his wound, reproached the other.

"Why did you do that, Beaufort?" he said.

"Because the young dog was first impudent to me and then struck me. Come let us go on and join the party."

But the other did not go on. He remained with the boy, who was badly wounded, and when he was satisfied that it was the only thing to do carried him to his father's cottage and sent for a doctor. The latter, after examining the wound, said the boy would probably die, but this he could not tell.

"Here is money for your services," said the rescuer. "Attend him till he is well or succumbs and report to me, Count Marivard, at the Hotel de Ville in Paris. When this is exhausted I will send you more."

The count left, followed by the blessings of the boys' parents, while the boy himself looked after him as he passed out with an expression of gratitude to which words could have added nothing. He lingered between life and death for awhile, then began to mend slowly. Again and again his doctor reported his condition to Count Marivard in the city, and every time the messenger returned with a gift of money. At last the boy recovered and went to Paris to thank his benefactor. He found him an officer under the government and an influential man.

Ten years more passed before the great shock came which was destined to rid France of her oppressors. When the storm broke it swept over the innocent and the guilty. Even women and children were not exempt. The queen as well as the king was forced to mount the guillotine, while the dauphin—the heir to the throne—a boy of seven, was secretly disposed of in prison. Not only noblemen, but their wives and their grown children, went down before the tempest of wrath excited in a people by years of extortion and oppression.

Among the younger leaders of the revolution, now grown to manhood, was Victor Guerard, the victim of the Marquis of Beaufort's tyranny. He entered upon the work of regenerating France with the memory of his treatment burning within him. Each year since he had been shot had added to the wound in his mind, though that in his body had long ago healed. And when the people of his neighborhood congregated in groups to talk over the movement that was going on in the capital he was among them, showing them the scar left by the bullet of the aristocrat and inciting them to join in throwing off the yoke of the hated aristocrats.

When at last the first gust of the storm of revolution appeared in the courtyard of the palace of Versailles young Guerard was there with a scythe in his hands, a fire in his eye denoting that he was ready to cut down together the weeds, the grass and the flowers. When the mob broke into the room of Queen Marie Aintoinette he was there. When the king was taken by the mob to Paris, Guerard walked with others by his carriage, still carrying his scythe. When the king showed himself on the balcony of the palace of the Tuileries, decked with the cockade of the revolution, the man who had received the cut of a noble's whip across his cheek and had received his bullet in his body was one of the yelling crowd that derisively greeted the sovereign.

Then came what has passed into history as the reign of terror. Those of the so called middle—really the best—class, who had guided the revolution with a view to establishing a reform in the government, lost the control, and the flame they had helped to kindle burned them. The Girondists, representing the conservative, intellectual element, perished on the guillotine, singing the song of liberty they would have given France instead of the Napoleonic despotism that followed the revolution. After the Girondists—or, rather, at the time they were sacrificed—so called judges sat in improvised courtrooms for the purpose of eradicating the nobility that they might never again crush the people under their feet.

Victor Guerard was one of these judges. He wished not then so much to regenerate France as for revenge. He had had already enough to satisfy an ordinary person, but not for one who had felt the lash of an aristocrat across his cheek and the same tyrant's bullet crashing through his vitals.

One name, one face, he remembered—the name and face of the man who had shot him. He had hoped to meet this man, but thus far had not done so and feared that he had escaped with other nobles to Holland. He had in the beginning of the reign of blood handed in to the committee of safety the name of the Marquis of Beaufort as an enemy to France, which meant that he belonged to that class which must be eradicated and should be hunted down if possible for treatment by the guillotine.

One day while Judge Guerard was sitting on the bench—a chair before a rude table—dispensing with those accused of being enemies of France a man was led up before him on seeing whom he started. The prisoner was the man he was looking for, the Marquis of Beaufort. A gleam of triumph, of hate, of vengeance, shone in Guerard's eye. He could scarcely contain himself.

"Ahn, Citizen Beaufort! I am happy to meet you again, but I doubt if you remember me."

"I do not," said the marquis.

"Do you recollect meeting a country boy some ten or a dozen years ago and ordering him to carry your gun and game bag?"

"I do."

"And the cut you gave him with your whip?"

"Yes; I remember."

"And the bullet you put in his side?"

"I am very sorry for that. I should not have done it. I was angry."

"Ah! You are sorry for it? Do you think, you nobles, being sorry for the centuries you have sucked the blood from the French people will save you now that we have you in our power?"

The marquis made no reply to this.

"I regret that you have but one head for the guillotine. I would you had a thousand heads that I might strike off one every day. I should rejoice to think that you were every day to be tortured by the remembrance that another head must fall before night. Guards, take him away lest I soil my own hands with him!"

"One moment, Citizen Judge!" cried the prisoner.

"Well?"

"When years ago I left you bleeding on the road one of the hunting party stanched your wound, then took you up and carried you to your home and called a surgeon, under whose care you recovered."

"That noble man saved my life. Were he doomed to the guillotine and I could go in his place I would do so, for I am not my own, but his."

"Since the beginning of the revolution," continued the marquis, "I have seen this man and talked with him. He told me that there was one revolutionary leader in Paris whom he had befriended. He gave me this in case I should be in trouble and should meet you, M. le Judge."

Thrusting his hand into his pocket, he drew forth a scrap of paper, which he handed to Guerard. The latter opened it and read:

Citizen Guerard, I ask that you will befriend the Marquis of Beaufort.

The struggle that appeared in Guerard's face—a struggle between revenge and gratitude—is not to be described in words. He sat with the paper in his hand regarding the man he had just condemned to death. At one time a fierce light in his eye and a rush of blood to his face indicated that revenge had conquered. Then it seemed as if he felt the soft touch of an angel's wing, and the expression changed to one of childlike gentleness. While the struggle was going on every face was turned upon the judge, seeking to understand what this singular interruption meant. At last he said:

"Clear the room. I wish to be alone with this man."

When all had gone Guerard said:

"Where is the Count Marivard?"

"In England."

There was a silence for some moments, when the judge spoke again:

"My interest in the revolution is gone. I had hoped to see you perish and that I might have an opportunity to give my benefactor his life. Both these wishes are denied me. By this bit of paper"—crumbling it spasmodically in his hand—"you go free. I shall send you back to prison, telling those who have witnessed the scene just past that you have important information to give concerning certain nobles in hiding. Tonight you will be taken out ostensibly for a special execution. You will be driven to the border, where you will be safe."

He paused a moment with bowed head, then cried:

"Guards!"

Brakeman's Thrilling Experience.

One of those marvelous escapes from tragic death that sometimes thrill the hearts of railroad men and their friends occurred at an early hour on Sunday morning in the Altoona yard, opposite WJ office, East Altoona, says the Altoona Tribune.

The man who was the central figure in this remarkable happening was John W. North, of 1211 Fourteenth street, Altoona, a brakeman in the local yard. He started to cross a track which he thought open, but a draft of cars came down the hump just in time to strike him and knock him down. He fell on the track between the rails, and the entire draft of ten or twelve cars passed over him.

Fortunately he had presence of mind to lie perfectly still and to this fact he owes his life. He was picked up and hurried to a company surgeon's office, where it was found that he had not sustained any injuries save a few bruises and a scratch on one arm, received when he fell.

He was, however, suffering considerably from nervous shock and will be confined to his home for some days before he will be able to resume work.

Lewisburg Man Suicide.

Frank Poeth, aged 59 years, committed suicide at Lewisburg shortly after 1 o'clock Monday afternoon by shooting himself.

He resided on South Front streetf Lewisburg, and about 1 o'clock left the house, telling his wife he was going fishing. He went out along Buffalo creek, a short distance from the new public playground, laid down behind a tree and shot himself behind the right ear with a revolver.

Two Bucknell students passing near the spot heard groans and went to investigate. They found the wounded man and secured help, but he died before reaching home.

Mr. Poeth had been a section foreman on the Pennsylvania railroad for many years, but owing to ill health had not been able to work for some time. This made him despondent and he had threatened to take his own life. His wife had, for this reason, secured the revolver and hid it, but he had, without her knowledge, found it and carried out his oft-expressed threat of suicide.

Mr. Poeth is survived by his wife, two sons and two daughters.

Now a Federal Offense.

To assist the railroads to protect interstate freight shipments from theft, congress has enacted a law making such theft an offense against the National government.

For years railroads and shippers have suffered heavy losses from theft of goods in transit. These losses in many cases amount to more than the claims paid by a railroad for goods damaged in train wrecks. On the Pennsylvania Railroad in 1912, claims to the extent of $28,900, due entirely to theft, were paid, while claims paid for goods damaged in wrecks amounted to only $16,900.

Owing to the fact that trains run through many different counties and States, railroad authorities have heretofore found it very difficult to prosecute and detect thieves because in such prosecution it was necessary to establish the location of the crime.

Though the Carlin Act, as the new law is called, these thieves must face prosecution in the Federal court either in the district where the thief is apprehended with the stolen goods. In other words, the new law makes it possible for railroads and the National government effectively to expedite the prosecution of thieves who make a practice of robbing freight cars and depots.

Mrs. C. Johnson, 365 Bishop St., Bellefonte, Pa., says: 'My back was so lame and painful that I could hardly get around and dizzy spells were common. I was restless at night and my kidneys gave me great annoyance, the kidney secretions being unnatural. On one of my family's advice I used Doan's Kidney Pills, procured at Green's Pharmacy Co. and they did me more good than any other medicine I had previously taken. The kidney secretions became natural and the pains and lameness in my back was removed. I heartily recommend Doan's Kidney Pills to anyone having kidney complaint. Railroad Rumor Revived.

The new railroad bridge across the Raystown branch at Mount Dallas is being pushed to a rapid completion. Eight of the piers are up and one of the abutments. Most of the iron work is on the ground. The work is being pushed as fast as possible, and it is reported in railroad circles in Huntingdon this week that the new bridge is to be a part of the new railroad system connecting the New York Central lines with the Western Maryland railroad.

According to reports a new road is to be built from Mill Hall on the New York Central via Spruce Creek to McConnellstown on the Broad Top, and from Mount Dallas to Little Orelans, Md., where connection is to be made with the Western Maryland. The Huntingdon and Broad Top railroad is to be a part of the new system. From Mount Dallas the road is to go south through Black Valley to Maryland. It is said that the new road will give a direct outlet from the coal fields owned by New York Central interests over their own lines to the seaboard. Now much of that coal comes via Cumberland, over the Pennsylvania and the Broad Top to Huntingdon, and thence over the Pennsylvania to the east. With the new lines in operation, the haul will be over the New York Central and allied lines. It has been reported for some time that the New York Central had secured control of the Huntingdon and Broad Top, and the new bridge at Mount Dallas, and the preparations for the building of the connecting links lends color to that rumor.

Surveyors have been in the eastern and southern parts of the county for several months, but their operations have been surrounded with such secrecy that no information could be obtained as to their work.

It was reported for a time that the new bridge was to furnish an outlet for the Everett Furnace direct to the Broad Top tracks, but the bridge is going across the river on a grade that carries the track well above the tracks of the Everett Furnace, which shows that it is not intended for that purpose.

People in Everett and the part of the county along the Broad Top road look for a big increase in the business of that section when the new system is completed. It will furnish the Broad Top mining section with new shipping facilities for the output of the coal mines. The people of Monroe and Southampton townships are elated over the prospect of a railroad for that isolated part of this county.

WAR ON FLIES

State Livestock Board Asks Co-operation of Butchers.

Every butcher in Pennsylvania has received a copy of the following letter, sent out from the offices of the State Livestock Sanitary Board, at Harrisburg:

It is important, with the approach of warm weather, that something be done to prevent flies in and about slaughter house and places where meat is exposed for sale.

Manure, particularly horse manure, human feces, cow manure, such as the contents of paunches of slaughtered cattle and accumulation of organic refuse, and rubbish similar to that found around unsanitary slaughter houses and markets afford the most favorable conditions for flies to breed.

The fly lays about one hundred and twenty eggs. There may be from eight to fourteen breeds annually. It is calculated that the progeny of a single female fly might be over 14,000,000,000,000,000 individuals at the end of the twelfth generation. The form and character of the fly's body and limbs is particularly adapted for carrying the infectious material. Since it breeds in fecal matter as has been shown, and feeds on even more dangerous material such as is found in cuspidors, privies, the carcasses of dead animals, decomposed meat and other equally germ laden material, the consequent facility for the spread of disease breeding germs is very apparent. It has been found that a single fly carried in its mouth and on its leg 100,000 fecal bacteria. The number of bacteria on a single fly may reach over 600,000.

It has been pointed out that filth breeds flies and flies breed death, and that the fly is far more dangerous than a wild beast roaming about for the reason of its enormous capacity for multiplication and silent mischief.

The fly has been condemned because it carries typhoid, dysentery, tuberculosis, infantile diarrhoea, anthrax smallpox, asiatic cholera, opthalmia and other dangerous diseases. It has recently been further condemned for spreading that dreaded disease infantile paralysis.

Is it not then important for the Meat Hygiene Service of the State Livestock Sanitary Board to have the hearty co-operation of careful and tidy butchers and local Boards of Health in requiring the careless and slovenly butcher to keep his establishment and its surroundings clean so that there may be no place for this dangerous pest to breed? Is it not likewise high time for the butchers throughout the State to provide screens to protect the meats contamination as as has been done in a few localities? Your hearty co-operation in dealing with this important problem is earnestly requested.

Your truly,
C J. MARSHALL,
State Veterinarian.

A GOOD NAME.

Colonel Roosevelt this week traveled across the continent to press a charge against a Michigan publisher who declared during the last presidential campaign that the former President was virtually a drunkard. The Colonel brought suit for $10,000 damages. He frankly says that he did not bring suit because he wanted or needed the money. What he wanted was that his name be cleared of the charge. In this he did only what any other good man would have done. A good name is a priceless treasure. It is something entirely too sacred to be besmirched at the will of others. That the doughty Colonel succeeds in clearing his name of the charge of excessive drinking is the hope of friends and opponents, alike. One of the greatest evils of present-day politics is the freedom with which irresponsible persons hurl charges and accusations against men in public life. The practice has been carried to such extremes that the country is suffering the loss of the assistance and co-operation of lots of brainy men who prefer a retired life to one of public activity. To serve in public affairs nowadays means to subject oneself to all manner of abuse and criticism. Men of probity, of the highest standing in their home communities, where they are best known, are made the targets for sensational charges and attacks in other sections where they are not so well known and where the people may the more easily be deceived. The slander against Colonel Roosevelt is a fair illustration of this. We hope for his sake, as well as for the sake of others in public life, that he wins the fight to clear his good name.

NAME THE CHILD

The "Centre Democrat" last week published a two-column scream to throw a few bricks at some un-named person or persons in the Democratic party. Those on the inside of Democratic affairs in Centre County are no doubt able to at once identify the person or persons to whom the "Centre Democrat" alludes. The general public, however, is not so well posted. A little more specific information would be entertaining, if not instructive. For instance, whom does the "Centre Democrat" have reference to when it says:

We have in this section pronounced "Democrats" who for years wore the livery of the party and wallowed in its spoils continuously for over a half century. During former years the "organization" of our party did the thinking for the rank and file. Our delegates to state conventions were chosen invariably without regard to convictions, pledges or promises to the voters—simply chosen to take orders. County chairmen too often were the willing tools to those higher up, and passed the orders down along the line, and frequently dispensed only part of the grease extract from big corporations, the whisky distillers and beer brewers, out to their select "privates" in the ranks. That was the system notoriously known to all. It was Democracy misbranded for years.

Likewise, the "Centre Hall Reporter" throws a brick at some un-named "assailant" of County Chairman Kimport. Again the public is dropped off with scant courtesy and compelled to resort to guessing as to the name of the man who would dare assume to even question the Mr. Kimport's efficiency. The "Centre Hall Reporter" says:

In a few words it may be said that Democratic County Chairman A. B. Kimport is all right. He manipulated the machinery when Centre county won the greatest Democratic victory it had in many years, and he has since not become inefficient. It is a mistaken idea that because one man was forced to give up his position in the Democratic state headquarters to make room for one in closer touch with the people, that all the Democrats in Centre county and in Pennsylvania are carrying daggers. The one thing the man who boasts in being a straight Democrat wants to keep in mind is that there are others. The straight Democrat, the honest politician, will not sulk when he is called on to step down out of office and go to work with the common herd to elevate others. If this is done the efficiency of Mr. Kimport as a county chairman will not be questioned by his present assailant.

We assume that both the "Centre Democrat" and the "Centre Hall Reporter" know about whom they are talking. If not, they should not talk. If they do they owe it to the public to be more specific. Why not get out into the open and take the public into their confidence? Let the band play.

Mrs. G. W. Williams Dead.

Mrs. Ellen Williams, wife of G. W. Williams, of Ore Hill, formerly of Scotia, died on Sunday morning, last, at her late home at Ore Hill from diphtheria. The body was removed to Scotia on Monday, and interment was made at Pine Hall cemetery on Monday afternoon, the services being conducted by Rev. Mr. Runyan. The death of Mrs. Williams removes a woman who was well known and universally liked. She was a devout Christian and by her many splendid qualities she had endeared herself to all who knew her intimately. She was an ideal wife and mother and her loss will be keenly felt in the home. Deceased was born at Pennsylvania Furnace and was 41 years old on March 14th, last. She was a daughter of Martin and Jane Farber, the latter still residing at Scotia. Surviving also are her husband, one son, Calvin, at home, and two sisters and one brother, as follows: Mrs. Calvin Murtorff, of Scotia; Mrs. J. Woomer, of Graysville, and William H. Farber, of Scotia. A young son of Mrs. Williams was some years ago shot and killed by Bert Delige, who was hanged for the murder of Mrs. John Baudis. Mrs. Williams' father was killed several years ago by falling down a shaft at Penna. Furnace.

Charles E. Neff Dead.

Charles Elliott Neff died at 2.10 o'clock on Friday afternoon of last week at his late home at Castaena. He had been ill five months to the day, finally passing away peacefully. The deceased was well and favorably known in Howard. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and by his many friends was held in high esteem. At the time of his death he was aged 51 years and 6 months. Surviving to mourn his passing away are a widow and one son, Leroy E. Neff, his parents, William H. and Margaret Anne Neff, of Howard, and these brothers and sisters: William N. Neff, Mrs. Jennie Weirick and Mrs. Clara Dunham, of Howard. These half-brothers also survive: Edward Neff, of Chicago; Robert M. Neff, of Tyrone, and Lott Neff, of Howard.

Mrs. Oscar McMullen Dead.

Mrs. Anna McMullen, wife of Oscar McMullen, died on Tuesday, May 27th, at the Bellefonte hospital. Funeral services will be held on Friday morning at 9.30 o'clock, conducted by Rev. C. W. Perfume Tipplers.

"There are scores of women in London who drink eau de cologne," says a doctor. "Several society women are known to make large purchases of this perfume, and the sellers never for a moment imagine that their fashionable customers buy it for drinking instead of perfuming purposes. It is possible to become quite intoxicated by taking eau de cologne. This scent is really alcohol, and many women drink it neat.

A SECRET OF THE ALPS

Was It Better Kept or Divulged?

By MILLARD MALTBIE

Touring in Switzerland, I went to Chamounix with a view to climbing Mont Blanc, but the weather was not favorable, and I was obliged to spend all the time I had to spare for that purpose watching and waiting for a change. I strolled about a good deal, sometimes going up the side of the mountain. On one of these walks I came upon the chalet of an old mountaineer in whose chat I was interested. He lived with his son-in-law, who was a guide, and his daughter. The couple had several children, the oldest of whom was a boy of fourteen. Before I left Chamounix I had so far won the old man's confidence that he told me a story involving a bit of family history.

I give it in his own words. I noticed while he was telling it that his face wore an expression of one who had something on his conscience of which he was not satisfied. At least such was my impression.

"My daughter Lena when she was a little girl was a veritable snow bird. There was no height to which she would not climb, no precipice over the edge of which she would not look without drawing back. Once I saw her standing on a cliff poised as if ready to sail down on to the snow some forty feet below. Then, to my horror, she stepped off. Her fall was somewhat broken by the air being caught beneath her skirts, and she seemed to sail down like a swallow.

"I ran toward the spot where she had fallen and found her in the soft snow some three or four feet below the surface. Had I not been on hand to assist her it is questionable if she would have been able to dig herself out. When I released her she laughed in great glee.

"I took her home and spanked her, but it didn't do any good. That child did not know the meaning of the word fear, and it seemed as if she believed she could fly from one cliff to another. At any rate, after what had happened I was always in dread lest in attempting to imitate a bird she would be killed. Such children are always loved more than those made in the ordinary way, and Lena was worshiped by me and her mother, and there was no one about here who did not know her for something odd. She passed among them all as 'the little snow bird.'

"My old friend Pfeiffer had a son five years older than Lena, and Pfeiffer had made a lot of money down on the line between Switzerland and Italy smuggling goods across the Italian lakes. For the reason of this money, which would one day belong to young Gustav Pfeiffer, I was quite willing to betroth Lena to Gustav to be married when she should be old enough. But Lena had a playmate, Fritz Henkel, who was as fearless among the mountains as she, and the two became lovers. Young Henkel as soon as he became old enough began to guide tourists up the mountain, for he knew every foot of the way, and every one said he was more at home there than in the valley.

"But I had no idea of my daughter marrying a guide, who was liable at any time to go down with the avalanche and leave her a widow, with nothing to live on, when she could have a young man with money in the bank at Geneva. So I kept my contract with Pfeiffer. Lena was much broken in spirit at not being allowed to marry the young man she loved, but I thought that after she had been married awhile and had children she would settle down to the humdrum of life like the rest of us and forget about Fritz Henkel. She could have run away with him and been married, but she would not. Her mother had died, and she knew I needed her and if she made a break between herself and me I would have no one to take care of me in my old age.

"When Henkel knew that he must lose her, like a good fellow he went away from her to Interlaken and guided tourists up the Jungfrau and the other mountains thereabout. He would not come back here even to see his father and mother, though he sent them a part of his earnings. As for Lena, she did what she could to be content as the wife of a man she did not love. She did not complain, but I saw that to please me she had made a sacrifice that she might never recover from. Besides, Gustav did not turn out very well. His father, unfortunately for my plan, continued to live instead of dying at a proper age and leaving his money to his son. Nor did he give Gustav anything either on which to live. So Gustav, instead of taking up any steady employment, thought he could make money as his father had made it and became a smuggler.

"But every year the revenue men became more watchful and expert in detecting smugglers and, what is worse for the smugglers, more honest, though perhaps this was because they themselves were more closely watched. At any rate, Gustav did not succeed as his father had succeeded and at last was caught smuggling and was sent to prison.

"I was much depressed by what had done, but Lena did not reproach me. She took good care of me and made what little we had to live on go as far as possible. And I have learned since that she permitted Fritz to send small sums of money to her to be spent for comforts for me, for Pfeiffer as he grew older grew more and more stingy and would do nothing at all for his daughter-in-law. But Fritz never came here. He was too honorable for that.

"After Gustav had served about a year of his term in prison he escaped with some other prisoners. They were chased into the mountains, and those chasing them saw them while crossing a glacier suddenly go down into a crevasse which was covered over with a thin coating of snow and ice. Since the crevasse was very deep and they must all have been killed by the fall no effort was made to secure their bodies. In forty or fifty years, when the point in the glacier where they were killed reaches the valley and melts, they will appear again.

"As soon as I heard of the death of these men I sent word to Fritz that if he chose to marry Lena he would have my consent. He came to see us, but Lena was not sure that her husband had been among the men who went down into the crevasse. She would wait a year anyway, and within that time if Gustav were alive she would surely hear from him. Fritz agreed to this, and, though we did not speak of it, we all hoped that Gustav would not be heard from.

"But the prison authorities assured me that Gustav was one of the escaped prisoners who had been killed, and I, anxious to undo the harm I had done, persuaded Lena not to wait till the year was out, but to be married, and we would all three be now comfortable, Fritz resuming his work as guide at Chamounix. The truth is we needed what Fritz could earn, for we had little or nothing with which to procure food.

"So they were married a few months after Lena became a widow or was supposed to have become a widow, for Gustav's father, notwithstanding the assurances of his son's death, refused to believe him dead. Lena very soon changed from her depressed condition and once more became light hearted. She made several trips with Fritz to the top of the mountain and seemed, like him, to be in her natural element while climbing.

"And now I am going to tell you a secret that is not known to any one about here. One day I was out on a path leading toward this house, a path which did not come from Chamounix, but from another direction. While following the trail, suddenly, under a cliff some fifty feet high, I came upon the body of a man.

"He was my daughter's husband.

"He had evidently been on the path when, after winding around an incline, it had led along the edge of the cliff above and had fallen. He had died within not more than a few days before, and Lena had not been really married to Fritz. Their first child, which was expected, would not be born in wedlock, according to the civil law or that of the church.

"What did I do? I carried the body to a chasm, the bottom which no man has ever seen, and dropped it in. There it lies buried and will lie till this world is broken by some great convulsion, such as that from which the mountains were formed.

"But I kept my secret. That happened fifteen years ago, and neither my daughter nor my son-in-law knows that for some time after they began to live together they were not married. Nor was it necessary that they should.

"Why was Gustav where I found him? About that we can only surmise. There are many theories. The one I most count on is that he had contrived when pursued to separate himself from the others and hide till the pursuers had passed. His only safety would be in going as far as possible from his former home. Perhaps he went to America or Australia. But at last, tired of remaining away, he had concluded to pay a visit to his home. He had stolen into Switzerland and taken a path familiar to him that would lead him down to this house. How he came to fall over the cliff is a greater mystery. I can only account for it in this way: He was not a temperate man, and when sent to prison the habit of drink had already fastened itself upon him. Probably, after he escaped, during his wanderings he became more of a slave than ever. And possibly while on his way to his former home he was drunk.

"A few years after his death his father died, and, having no one else to leave his money to, he left it to Lena. She had always been a favorite with him, and, although he had opposed her second marriage on the ground that his son would turn up, as the years went by without any word from him the old man admitted that it was as well that she had married Fritz."

The narrator paused at this point, but presently continued:

"You are the first person to whom I have imparted this secret, and I have imparted it to you with an object. I have at times been disturbed with an uneasy conscience as to whether I should have acted as I did upon the discovery of Gustav's body. I have told you the story that I might ask you whether I did right or whether I did wrong."

"That," I replied, "is a matter of opinion. I can only assure you that had I been in your place I would have done exactly as you did."

"Should I not have told Pfieffer my secret?"

"You would have settled his mind as to his son being dead. But through him you might have revealed the truth to those who would better not know it."

The speaker grasped my hand and drew a long sigh of relief.

The last meeting of the Study Class will be held on Tuesday evening, June 3rd, at 8 o'clock in the Auditorium of the High School Building. The subject "The Machinery of Politics," will be introduced under the following heads: Origin of the Political Machinery; Relation to National and State Constitution; Application to Local Elections. Mrs. J. Thomas Mitchell being well prepared to do so will present the subject.

The consensus of opinion is that the time devoted to study and discussion this winter has been most profitable. This being the case the work will be continued next year. A suggestive program, subject to criticism or complete change, will be considered on Tuesday evening, but this will not preclude other subjects that may be offered by interested parties.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, June 3rd and 4th, a school exhibit of the work of the Sewing Class will be open to the public in the Directors room of the High School building. More than 20 dresses cut and made by the girls of the eighth grade, besides the splendid results of the girls of the fifth, sixth and seventh grades, will be included in the collection. The sewing school is under the supervision of Mrs. John P. Lyon, who is assisted by Miss Ida Green, (the head teacher), and a number of other good women who spend their time once a week to giving the girls instruction in sewing. The girls are taught to sew on the machine as well as by hand.

By way of encouragement, and to express your appreciation of this most excellent feature, will not you visit this exhibition? This attention on your part is due these faithful workers, besides you will be delighted with what has been done.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY

Just half a century ago on Wednesday 28th, Peter Corl and Barbara Reish were united in the holy bonds of wedlock by Rev. W. H. Grough at the parsonage in Boalsburg. The fiftieth anniversary of this happy event was celebrated in royal style at the old Corl homestead yesterday. The result of the union consummated fifty years ago was twelve children, nine boys and three girls. Two boys died in infancy. Now the family circle has been increased by the addition of thirty-five grand-children and four great-grand-children. The home-coming was planned for the children, grand-children and great-grand-children and the occasion proved to be one that will long be cherished by those who were so fortunate as to be present.

The day was ideal for an outing and tables were spread beneath the towering branches of oak trees more than a century old. As the happy old couple appeared on the grassy lawn they were reminded of their return to the same spot to partake of a wedding breakfast half a century ago. It was at the old homestead that all of their children were born and the presence of all for the day's festivities made the occasion an especially happy one.

The Corls are noted as prosperous and progressive farmers and all reside almost within sight of the old home tree. The children have always prided themselves on their loyalty and devotion to their parents and it was this spirit which predominated in the preparations for the celebration of the golden wedding anniversary.

In religious affairs the Corls are allied with the Reformed church, being members of the Pine Hall church and Sunday school. Politically they are rock-ribbed Democrats. All are members of Washington Grange, Patrons of Husbandry. Mr. Corl and his good wife, heads of this interesting family, are hale and hearty and enjoy splendid health. About five years ago they retired from active farming and now reside in a handsome new brick home nearby Struble. There they are enjoying a well earned rest, considering it somewhat like child's play for them to look after a 36-acre farm and care for a number of horses and cows. As one might expect from such a family, the Corl home is noted for its open-hearted hospitality.

Children's Flower Beds.

By the kindly generosity of our Congressman, the Hon. Charles E. Patton, more than three hundred children under twelve years of age in the Bible Schools of Bellefonte and its suburbs, including over fifty Roman Catholic parochial pupils, have received packages of flower seeds for beds about three feet square, which they are expected to keep in good gardening condition. This they can do by faithful attention to the following directions:

1. Fine loose soil, mixed with black leaf mold if possible.
2. Keep the ground free from weeds.
3. In dry weather, sprinkle water in the evening.
4. If plants are too thick, thin them carefully.
5. Never water the plants in the morning.
6. Take the full length of the stems when gathering flowers.
7. Small bouquets bring good cheer when taken by little children to sick people.
8. Pupils do well taking samples of flowers to their teachers.
9. It is always in place to have flowers on the dining-table, as well as in the church and school-room.

I hope to be in Bellefonte some time in summer and will then call around and see as many flower beds as possible.

MISSIONER.

Oil For State Roads.

Two 7000 gallon tank cars filled with oil for State road work arrived in Bellefonte several days ago from Connecticut. The oil will be used as a binder on finished roads nearby town. It is quite a task to remove the oil from the tank cars and transport it to distant points. The tank car must first be run onto a trestle, the discharge valves being in the bottom of the car. Raw steam must then be injected into the car to bring the oil to a certain temperature before it will pass freely through the discharge valves. Tank wagons will be used to transport the oil to different sections where it is desired. The tank wagons are equipped with sprinkler attachments and the oil is sprayed over the roads on the same principle as the old fashioned street water sprinkler. The State Highway Department has a limited number of wagon tank sprinklers and the operation of distributing the oil on the roads nearby town will likely take several weeks.

Miss Alpha Hafer, who was called home by the death of her father, the late Dr. A. W. Hafer, on Tuesday returned to New Haven, Conn., where she is assistant superintendent in a hospital.

Mrs. D. H. Hastings and daughter, Miss Sarah, returned from Harrisburg on Monday. Mrs. Hastings is entertaining her sister, Mrs. Kinsloe, of Philadelphia, in whose honor a small supper was given at the Hastings home on Wednesday evening.

Mr. Freeze, of State College, and Mrs. George B. Thompson and the latter's two boys, John and George, Jr., spent Saturday in Bellefonte, primarily to take in the circus. John remained over to make a little visit with his grandmother, Mrs. Louise Bush.

The Bellefonte Academy baseball team had some good luck and a lot that wasn't so good on its trip last week to the western end of the State. On Thursday the Academy defeated the strong Indiana State Normal team, at Indiana, 4—2, it being Indiana's first defeat on their home grounds this year. A game with the University of Pittsburgh was scheduled for Friday, but this was knocked out by the all-day rain. On Saturday the Academy was billed to play the Westinghouse team, but Thursday's defeat of Indiana by the Academy apparently fanned cold air over the feet of the Westinghouse boys for they backed out and no game could be played. On Saturday afternoon, next, the Academy will play the Williamsport High School team on Hughes field. Williamsport has been playing good ball this year and a close game is looked for.

Mrs. George Robb was 68 years old on Tuesday and a number of her friends assembled at her home beyond Coleville on Tuesday evening and tendered her a most delightful surprise. A delicious supper was served and all present had a most enjoyable time. Although nearing the seventieth milestone Mrs. Robb enjoys the very best of health. She has a host of admiring friends who wish for her many more years blessed with happiness and prosperity. George Robb had planned the party as a surprise for his wife and he managed it so cleverly that she was completely fooled. About 8.30 o'clock the guests arrived and warmly greeted Mrs. Robb. Several hours were devoted to music and games. Mrs. Robb was the recipient of some very handsome presents. Colonel Hugh S. Taylor has demonstrated his bravery on the field of battle, but when it came to facing a regiment of ladies George Robb pronounced him a poor soldier. The Colonel's experience when brought face to face with the "Egyptian Mummy" was one of the laughable hits of the evening. Those present included George Robb, Jr., and wife and two children, Marcella Robb and Master John Robb, Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Drake, Mrs. Elizabeth Grubb, Dewey Grubb, Mrs. Milton Robb, Mr. and Mrs. Lee, Miss Helen Billett, Miss Edna Billett, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Miller, Herbert Robb, Miss Anna Ross, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Stover, Mrs. H. Stover, Harry Poorman, Colonel Taylor, Hard P. Harris and Charles E. Dorworth.

Pittsburgh Door and Sash Co. vs. same. Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $274.69.

John Hirst vs. same. Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $57.15.

Lillie G. Reeder vs. Trustees of the Bellefonte Academy, a corporation. Scire facias sur mortgage. Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $11,104.30.

The first case for trial on Monday afternoon was W. C. Lingle vs. Gellatley O'Donnel Company, Incorporated, being an action brought to recover for services as Superintendent for the defendant Company, who were the successors of the Graham Coal Company, from June 15, 1910, to November 26, 1910, at $200 per month. Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1073.17, on Tuesday morning.

J. W. Bruss vs. Roland C. Swisher and R. T. Comley, who survive Austin W. Swisher, deceased, being an action brought to recover for damages on an injunction bond, the plaintiff being the owner of about 20 acres of land in Union Township, having loaned the same to a man by the name of Green from April 1, 1908, to April 1, 1909, Green not removing from the premises at the expiration of the lease alleged title in Austin W. Swisher instead of the plaintiff, whereupon the plaintiff instituted ouster proceeding before a Justice of the Peace and had judgment rendered in his favor. Whereupon Austin W. Swisher instituted injunction proceedings against the plaintiff, the Justice and the Constable enjoining the plaintiff and others from interfering with the said Swisher's title or the tenant, the said Swisher having given bond with the above named defendants in the sum of $500. Upon the hearing of the equity proceedings the court filed an opinion that the equity proceeding would not lie and dissolved the injunction and directed Swisher to bring his action in ejectment, which was done, and when the ejectment action was called for trial the plaintiff in that proceeding suffered a voluntary nonsuit. This present action was brought to recover for damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of being deprived of the use of his property from May, 1909, to February 1910. The defendant offered testimony tending to show that the damages suffered by the plaintiff were speculative and further offered a receipt by the Constable tending to show the payment of rent for the period covered by the injunction. Verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $50.00

The Ohio Valley Clay Company, a corporation, vs. the National Glass Brick Company, a corporation, defendants, and Lew Wallace and Chas. M. McCurdy, President of the Y. M. C. A., garnishees. This was an action in attachment execution, attaching money in the hands of the garnishees on a contract between the contractor, Wallace, and the defendant Company. The jury were sworn to try the case only as against the garnishees, the defendant being in Fayette County. During the taking of the testimony on the part of the plaintiff it developed that the defendant Company were not any longer the owners of the fund in the hands of the garnishees but that the same was owned by a bank at Connellsville, of which the garnishees had notice prior to the service of the attachment execution upon the garnishees. At the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant garnishees moved the Court for compulsory non-suit, whereupon the Court gave binding instructions to the jury to find in favor of the garnishees and against the plaintiff.

The next case for trial was Sarah A. Homan vs. J. H. Weber and S. E. Weber, trading as J. H. and S. E. Weber and C. P. Long. Being an action in trespass. On trial Wednesday evening.

All jurors not empaneled in this last case were discharged on Wednesday afternoon.

M. M. McLaughlin, a member of the Mifflin County bar, was in attendance at Court during the present week.

THE BEST.

Good, better, best!
Never let it rest
Till your good is better
And your better best.

The Crops.

Bradstreet's Report says: Winter-wheat conditions have deteriorated slightly from early almost perfect prospects, the chief falling off being in Kansas, Oklahoma and parts of Illinois. In California the crop has suffered also. All of this is the result of early dry weather now being revealed. Still, the prospects are for a bumper crop as a whole. In the northwest there has been plenty of cool, wet weather, and warm growing temperatures are needed for spring wheat. Wet weather delays corn planting west of the Mississippi. Most of that east of the Mississippi has been put in, but in Iowa and Nebraska planting is backward and the area seeded is only 25 to 75 per cent. of that contemplated. Oats west of the Mississippi look well, but cold, dry weather east of the river has caused deterioration. Still, the season is early enough to make a good crop, though much below a year ago. Pastures generally are in good shape in the west, and the first crop of alfalfa is a large one.

Southern crop reports are more uniformly favorable. The drought in the southeast has been broken by showers, and the crops there and westward are doing well. In the lower Mississippi valley the sugar crop area is smaller than a year ago, when the yield was short.

UP IN THE AIR

Or How His Consent Was Won

By CLARISSA MACKIE

Mr. Lysander Tatem looked upon the latest invention of the young man who wanted to be his son-in-law with unconcealed interest. He had accepted the invitation to witness the trial flights of Jules Hazen's new aeroplane with all the skepticism that the hard headed man of business brings to bear upon the fanciful dreams of the inventor of things, and he also brought along with his distrust a strong dislike for the youth who had dared to fall in love with his only child, Katherine.

Katherine stood beside him, small and fair and wonderfully interested in the complication of canvas and machinery which Jules so skillfully guided through the air. There were just the three of them—Jules, Katherine and her father.

Jules essayed another flight, and as his machine rose gracefully to the level of the treetops Mr. Tatem shaded his eyes with his hand and followed his course. At last he brought his eyes down to earth.

"It must be a fascinating pastime if one is young and can afford to spend the time and money," he added hastily.

"That is Jules' profession, father. I suppose he might as well be an inventor as a banker or broker or anything else," said Katherine with spirit.

"Don't you think the life of an aviator, for instance, contains more risk than that of a banker?" demanded Lysander Tatem, who was fond of an argument.

"No, indeed," and Katherine lifted her pretty brows in surprise. "Just think of all the bankers who are killed in automobile accidents!"

"Humph!" snorted Mr. Tatem impatiently. "As if a man's profession made any difference when two automobiles come together. Just as many lawyers and brewers go to smash, my dear, as bankers. Be sensible now and admit that Hazen's profession or trade, or whatever you call it, of inventor and aviator is a hand to mouth existence at best. Did you ever hear of many rich inventors, Katherine?"

"No."

"That's the situation in a nutshell. Hazen is as poor as a church mouse. I suppose he thinks if he marries a banker's daughter he'll have a backer for his inventions."

Now the aeroplane swooped downward and alighted before them. Jules leaned out, his keen young face alight with pleasure.

"Will you go up with me, Mr. Tatem?" he asked. "I'm sure you'll enjoy the sensation of soaring in space. I promise to return you safe and sound to the earth."

Lysander Tatem hesitated for a moment, and then, persuaded by his daughter's encouraging smile and ashamed to admit his own reluctance to leave the earth in that manner, he stepped into the seat beside the young aviator.

The banker clung desperately to the slender supports as the birdlike machine swooped up, up, above the treetops and then glided evenly along above the earth. After the first sickening feeling as he saw the ground with its familiar objects dropping away beneath them, where Katherine stood a tiny speck waving a pin point of white after them, Lysander Tatem really began to enjoy the sensation of flying. He felt a new respect for the young man who wanted to be his son-in-law, and he earnestly hoped that the science would be perfected with such rapidity that he, too, might enjoy the sport of air flying.

Jules Hazen said little. Now and then he indicated the blurred outline of a city beneath them or explained the working of the machinery to the interested passenger, who grew more exhilarated as the minutes passed until an hour had gone by.

"Where are we now?" he asked at last.

"Blakeport," returned Hazen as he swung the machine circling about and headed for home. "There's rather a nasty wind coming up from the northeast. We'll see if we can't beat it."

They didn't beat the rapidly rising wind. It made such headway that the aviator guided his machine to a higher strata, hoping to escape the unfavorable wind. Higher and higher they arose until the feeling of nausea attacked the banker again, and he was obliged to exert every effort to maintain his seat.

"Close your eyes!" commanded Jules. And Mr. Tatem was gladly obedient. The first doubts of the aviator's ability to take him home again now assailed him.

"What's that?" He had to repeat this question in Hazen's ear, because the engine was giving forth such sharp staccato cracks that hearing was difficult.

"What's what?" shouted Jules.

"That noise, like the cracking of all the steel ribs," explained the uneasy passenger.

"Engine missing strokes," said Jules briefly, and Mr. Tatem had to be content with that explanation. But not for long was he satisfied with the situation. The machine was rushing through space with terrifying speed. Below them were cold, gray clouds and above them a clear, deep blue sky, from which the sun shone warmly.

There was absent the smooth gliding motion which had at first fascinated him, and there was something in the action of the engine and in the rigid lines of Hazen's profile that hinted to him that the young aviator, incensed at the banker's reluctance to accept him as the suitor of his daughter, might be sending them both to destruction.

"Hazen!" he shouted suddenly.

"Well?" returned the other without turning his head.

"I understand the situation now. If you're using my safety as a lever upon which to swing my decision in your favor you've attacked the wrong man, understand?" He screamed the last word in Hazen's ear, and the latter nodded, unsmiling, but still the machine went on its rushing course.

"Where are we now?" Mr. Tatem yelled again.

"Give it up. I can't tell yet."

The banker looked at the grim profile beside him, and something gave way in his spinal column. He must reach solid ground again at any price, he told himself. Jules Hazen might not prove so undesirable a husband for Katherine after all, he argued. His own safety was a matter of paramount importance just then.

All at once the aviator reached forward and did something to the machinery, and the aeroplane dipped down, down, down, until it speeded toward the gray clouds at a sickening angle. Then they were enveloped in the damp clouds and were out of them with the earth far below, and they were certainly falling down. Lysander Tatem lost his self control as he realized this fact.

"Hazen," he cried, "bring me safely to earth again and I'll consent to your marrying my daughter."

Jules turned a flushed face to his and made an unteliigible reply. Still they fell toward the earth, while the engine gave out that irresponsible staccato click. All at once Hazen leaned back in his seat, touched a lever and fumbled with some handles, and immediately the aeroplane stayed its dizzying fall, the engine swung into rhythmic beat, and they hung in the air for a moment while the aviator took his bearings. Then they went inward, perhaps a couple of hundred feet above the earth, until the banker recognized the familiar layout of the aviation field below.

Slowly, gracefully, like a weary bird, the machine glided toward the field and at last rested safely on it. Katherine Tatem ran toward them with fluttering handkerchief.

As Lysander Tatem stepped to the ground, stiff and sore and quite fagged by the excitement of the flight, he turned a pale and angry face toward Jules Hazen.

"Of course I shall keep my word, young man," he said harshly. "But I shall always have the greatest contempt for your methods!" and he strode toward his daughter, who was quick to observe the strained relations between them.

The appearance of the Tatem motorcar at that instant made the leave taking a matter easily concluded, and soon Katherine and her father were on the way home.

"You haven't said anything about the flight, father," said the girl after awhile. "You were gone so long I was afraid that something had happened."

Lysander Tatem swallowed a lump in his throat before replying. "It was an unnerving experience, my dear. It had one result which will gratify you—I have told Hazen that he has my consent to your marriage."

Katherine's warm hug was received by her father with manifest discomfort, and, perhaps realizing that this yielding of his really caused him suffering, she soon settled quietly beside him and was silent.

* * * * * * *

Several days passed before Jules Hazen made his appearance at the town house of Lysander Tatem. Then he asked for the banker and was shown into the gloomy grandeur of the library.

Mr. Tatem was reading before a west window, where the afternoon sun touched his white hair into a sort of golden radiance that made him look unusually benevolent as he arose to greet his visitor. This effect disappeared as soon as he stepped out of the sunshine, and Hazen saw that his face was grim and uncompromising.

"I've been expecting you, Mr. Hazen," said the banker.

Jules lifted his dark eyebrows. "I was afraid you were laboring under a delusion, Mr. Tatem," he said gravely, "and I called to set your mind at rest. While we were in the air the other day the machinery actually went wrong, and I really thought we were both going to destruction. After you mentioned your daughter I suddenly realized that you were Katherine's father and must be saved for her. Then my wits came back, and I recollected the emergency levers. The rest was easy. I release you from any rash promise you may have made in the moment of danger." He turned toward the door with a slight inclination of his head.

"Wait!" said Lysander Tatem in an agitated voice. "What about Katherine? I have told her that you have my consent."

The ticking of the clock broke regularly on the silence that followed. Jules Hazen's handsome face wore an expression of obstinate pride. Lysander Tatem found himself hoping that Hazen's pride would give way to love for Katherine. His own face was softening with pity for the daughter who was everything to him.

"Hazen," he said manfully, "I'm proud, but I can swallow it for Katherine's sake. I can't face her and tell her it was a mistake—she is so happy. Will you let bygones be bygones?"

Jules Hazen's face cleared as if by magic. "Thank you, sir. You won't regret the trust you have placed in me. Shall we go together and find her?"

Pennant in the Heart of Scotia.

tells that on the death of a highlander, the corpse being stretched on a board and covered with a coarse linen wrapper, the friends placed a wooden platter on the breast of the deceased containing a small quantity of salt and earth, separate and unmixed—the earth an emblem of the corruptible body, the salt an emblem of the immortal spirit.

Disinterested.

"What a splendid woman she is!"

"I am glad to think you have got such a wife."

"Such a wife! Why, man, you have no idea of her generosity. When I was poor she refused to marry me because she was afraid of being a burden upon me, but the moment I came into my fortune she consented at once. What do you think of that for kindness?"

Might Be Worse.

When the poet Wordsworth died an old lady at Ambleside lost no time in telling the mournful news to an old and confidential manservant. "Ey, ey!" quoth Thomas. "It's a gre't loss nae doot, but after a' it may not be sic a parlish loss as ye're coontin' on. Mrs. Wordsworth they say, is a gey, clever body, and she'll be carryin' on the business, we may be sewer."

A Miser's Wish.

Greedyliot, who is rather miserly, was recovering from a long illness. "How was it, doctor," he asked one day, "that I was able to live so many weeks without eating?"

"Why, you were fed by the fever."

"Are you sure?" Then after a moment's reflection, "I wish I could give it to my servants."

A Moralizing Burglar.

From continental Europe comes the story of a burglar who left the following note pinned to the pillow in a man on he had ransacked: "In the Bible it says, 'Lead us not into temptation.' Art and your show of wealth tempted me, and I fell, though an honest workingman. Therefore you are the sinner, not I. Repent before it is too late."

Perils of Crinoline.

The dangers of the historic crinoline are illustrated by a story told by Lady Dorothy Nevill in her reminiscences. Going too near the fireplace, her voluminous skirt caught fire, and in an instant she was in a blaze. There were no men present, and the women could not help her, because if they had gone near enough to be of use their own skirts would have been ignited. Fortunately Lady Dorothy had sufficient presence of mind to roll herself in the hearth rug and thus subdue the flames.

Optimism.

"Pa, do you know any optimists?"

"Yes. We have one in our office. Every time he draws his pay he thinks he is going to have several dollars left at the end of the week."—Chicago Record Herald.

Making Home.

"Yes," replied the bachelor, "but the trouble is some men married fellows never make it till about 3 a. m."—Philadelphia Record.

Glad to Them.

"Never be critical upon the ladies," was the maxim of an old Irish peer, remarkable for his homage to the sex. "The only way that a true gentleman ever will attempt to look at the faults of a pretty woman is to shut his eyes."

Character.

According to an old French saying, "A man's character is like his shadow, which sometimes follows and sometimes precedes him and which is occasionally longer, occasionally shorter than he is."

Jet.

Jet, that substance from which many articles of ornament are made, very closely resembles ordinary coal. It is formed, like coal, from wood and vegetable matter. It differs from coal in that it contains a much smaller quantity of earthly impurities. There is soft jet and hard jet, but only the latter is of much use in the making of ornamental articles.
